

Brain Injury

Understanding the Impact of a Brain Injury

A traumatic brain injury rarely looks the way people expect. Some injuries are obvious from the start. Others take days or weeks to reveal their full extent, showing up as memory problems, personality changes, difficulty concentrating, or a loss of physical coordination that wasn't there before. Whatever form it takes, a brain injury touches every part of a person's life, and often the lives of everyone around them.

At Shulman Rogers, we've worked with individuals and families navigating the aftermath of brain injuries caused by car accidents, falls, workplace incidents, and negligence of all kinds. We understand that no two injuries are the same, and no two recoveries look alike. Our job is to build a case that reflects your specific reality, not a generic version of what a brain injury "should" look like.

Common Causes We See

Brain injuries can result from a wide range of incidents, including:

- Car, truck, and motorcycle accidents
- Slip and fall accidents, particularly among older adults
- Sports and recreational accidents
- Workplace incidents
- Assaults or acts of violence
- Medical negligence during birth or surgery

What a Brain Injury Claim Needs to Account For

Because brain injuries often affect a person for the rest of their life, a fair settlement has to look further than the initial hospital bill. We work with medical experts, neuropsychologists, and life care planners to build a complete picture of what you're facing, including:

- Current and future medical treatment, including rehabilitation and therapy
- Cognitive and behavioral changes that affect work and relationships
- Lost income and reduced earning capacity over time
- Home modifications or ongoing care needs
- The emotional and psychological toll on you and your family

Why Families Choose Shulman Rogers

Brain injury cases are some of the most complex in personal injury law, largely because the damages aren't always visible on paper. Insurance companies often try to minimize claims by focusing only on what shows up on an MRI, ignoring the day-to-day reality of living with a brain injury. Our attorneys know how to push back on that, using medical evidence and expert testimony to show the true scope of what's changed.

We stay close to our clients throughout the process. That means clear communication, honest answers about where your case stands, and a team that's invested in getting you the outcome you and your family deserve.
